

Testimony Presented to the House Appropriations Committee
SB 897 – Medicaid Work Requirements

Gilda Z. Jacobs, President/CEO
May 2, 2018

Good Morning Chairwoman Cox and members of the House Appropriations Committee. I am Gilda Jacobs, president and CEO of the Michigan League for Public Policy, a nonpartisan research and advocacy organization that promotes economic opportunity for all, regardless of race, place or income and addresses poverty in a comprehensive manner. As a 12-year veteran of the Legislature, I understand what it means to be on both sides of the table. You have to balance the politics of the day with the needs of your constituents and the residents of our great state. I understand the careful line you have to walk because I've been in your shoes.

Today, we join numerous advocates in opposing Senate Bill 897, which would require the Department of Health and Human Services to seek a waiver from the federal government imposing work requirements on Medicaid recipients. While we appreciate Senator Shirkey's willingness to make changes to this bill, any changes to the bill—including lowering the hour threshold or adding exemptions—will not fix the underlying flaws in the legislation that will ultimately be harmful to Michigan families.

Research shows that a majority of Medicaid recipients who can work are already working and that work requirements will result in the loss of coverage for individuals, create an increased and undue burden on physicians and employers unable to complete cumbersome paperwork, come at a significant financial cost to both state and federal government, and may result in legal action.

Data from the University of Michigan shows that those on the Healthy Michigan plan are already working and if they are not, they are retired, students or suffering from a chronic health condition that may make it difficult to work. It is also very clear from a similar study done at the university that having access to health insurance through the Healthy Michigan Plan has improved individuals' abilities to go out and find a job or keep a job. Medicaid is indeed a work support, not a work program.

We also have concerns regarding the administrative burden and additional red tape. The Senate Fiscal Agency states that it would cost the state between $20-30 million annually to administer work requirements, but in comparing these costs to other states, this appears to be on the low end. And while the bill carves out a number of populations, there is cause for concern as to the amount of paperwork that those looking for an exemption may have to fill out, including potentially needing sign off from physicians or employers. It is not beyond the realm of possibility that people will lose access to health coverage because they are unable to qualify for a limited exemption, may not understand the process of qualifying for an exemption or that they may even qualify for one, or struggle to provide the necessary documentation to prove they qualify. Failure to comply with work requirements will result in a one year lockout from coverage.

The bill calls for the department to direct individuals trying to comply with requirements to existing resources for work training, transportation and child care, but provides no additional funding to these programs. These are vital support services for anyone trying to get or keep a job and challenges in accessing them may be exacerbated in rural parts of our state. The state would need to invest heavily in these programs to actually make it possible for people to meet these stringent work requirements. And this is true whether the person is working 29 hours, 20 hours or even 10 or 15 hours.

We also have concerns about how work requirements will hurt those that are working in industries with unstable work hours including retail, food services or in our state's extensive tourism industry. As you continue to look at this proposal we urge you to look more closely at the realities of the labor market, where jobs and supports are available, and what skills are needed for them.

The Michigan League for Public Policy was a strong advocate for the Healthy Michigan Plan when it passed in 2013. Nearly 670,000 people have received health insurance through the program and while many said that the program is "over-enrolled," perhaps it is more a reality of what many Michiganders are facing. Healthy Michigan has cut uncompensated care to our Michigan hospitals in half; it is likely that this progress would be reversed with implementation of work requirements. Work requirements will likely lead to huge coverage losses and just because someone loses health coverage, doesn't mean they won't still need care—they likely will return to hospitals for any and all care. This is especially worrisome for hospitals in rural areas.

Attempting to impose these harsh requirements will be detrimental to many Michigan populations, including Medicaid recipients, small business owners, doctors and medical staff, and state caseworkers. When it comes to our state Medicaid program, which is helping people and employers in every district in the state, I urge lawmakers to look for ways to improve the services, not haphazardly eliminate them.

Thank you for your time and consideration.

Medicaid Work Requirements: Why Making People Work Doesn't Work

Recent changes at the federal level now allow states to request waivers to enforce work requirements on Medicaid recipients. Some policymakers in Michigan have suggested that Michigan should adopt such a policy. However, work requirements for Medicaid are a bad idea for a number of reasons.

On Jan. 11, 2018, the federal Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) and the Centers on Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) provided guidance indicating the administration's decision to allow work requirements in Medicaid. CMS Administrator Seema Verma has historically cited her concerns about able-bodied individuals being enrolled in Medicaid; the population of "able-bodied" individuals is typically able to access Medicaid through expansion programs, for example, the Healthy Michigan Plan. However, a majority of the states that have requested work requirement waivers from CMS have been states that have not yet expanded Medicaid. This raises concerns about the implications of work requirements on the elderly, disabled and other traditional Medicaid populations as many of these states' work requirements would apply to these so-called traditional Medicaid populations. The decision to approve waiver requests relating to work requirements reverses years of both Republican and Democratic administrations' beliefs that the requirements do not promote the program's ultimate purpose of providing health insurance.

Despite HHS and CMS's claims, data and history show us that work requirements don't improve health outcomes or employment outcomes for those who qualify for Medicaid. Implementation of work requirements will ultimately result in lost coverage for individuals unable to complete cumbersome paperwork, properly qualify for an exemption, or overcome daily barriers to being able to get to work.

AGAINST MEDICAID OBJECTIVES

Section 1115 waivers, which would allow for states to request the use of work requirements for qualification of Medicaid, were created by Congress and were intended to be broad, but within the confines of the law. Specifically, that a Medicaid waiver must be an "experimental, pilot or demonstration project" that, in the judgment of the HHS secretary, is "likely to assist in promoting the objectives of" the Medicaid program.

If we look very plainly at the intent of the Medicaid program, the program was designed to give people with low incomes health insurance and improve their health. Nowhere in the Medicaid statute does it say that work could and can be used as a determination of eligibility. From that view, Medicaid is a health insurance program, not a jobs program—a basis supported by every previous administration.

When President Lyndon B. Johnson signed Medicaid into law in 1965, he stated:

"Millions of our citizens do not now have a full measure of opportunity to achieve and to enjoy good health, millions do not have protection or security against the economic effects of sickness.

And the time has now arrived for action to help them attain that opportunity and to help them get that protection.”

In this speech he also talked about lifting people out of poverty, helping the sick and developing compassion in our country. He spoke of “attaining opportunity” to receive healthcare—not to receive healthcare only if you are working.

In her speech to state Medicaid directors, CMS Administrator Verma stated that “if we are going to live up to the promise of Medicaid, we need to do more than simply pay for healthcare services, it’s why we believe community engagement requirements are actually in the spirit of Johnson’s idea.”

It is clear that much of the debate over Medicaid work requirements will be about whether or not they support the objectives of the program, which is expected to be one of the legal challenges states may use to block work requirements.

WAIVER LEGALITY

While CMS/HHS have provided guidance that they will accept waivers allowing for work requirements, there are some questions on whether or not they are legal. Under the Social Welfare Act, the act that created the Medicaid program, the secretary of HHS can waive certain parts of the Medicaid Act but cannot impose new eligibility criteria—in this case, the criteria of work in order to qualify for Medicaid. This is also expected to be the basis of legal challenges to work requirements.

Legal challenges will focus on individual states’ proposals and why CMS approved a specific waiver allowing for work requirements. It is important to note that blocking work requirements in one state through litigation does not mean that work requirements proposed in other states will be blocked by the courts.

CMS Administrator Verma has already defended the assumptions that legal challenges to work requirements will be forthcoming once waiver requests start being approved. She believes there is a link between having a job and positive health outcomes and has referenced numerous studies that show that. While this research does exist, there is some disagreement that this could be a “chicken before the egg” situation. Are people able to get a job because they are healthy or are they healthy because they have a job?

It is expected that this research will be used to defend HHS’s decisions to approve work requirements in states. It is also possible that legal challenges could be made on the basis of administrative procedure and whether the proper state and federal rulemaking process is followed before waivers are approved.

A lawsuit has already been filed in response to the recent approval of the Kentucky Medicaid waiver (Stewart v. Azar). The lawsuit identifies 15 plaintiffs ranging from retired workers, students, housekeepers, and car repairers, ranging in age from 20-62, all of whom rely on the healthcare provided by Medicaid. The plaintiffs are asking the court to declare the work requirements and the waiver in its entirety illegal on the basis of two different issues. The first declaring that HHS has “bypass[ed] the legislative process and act[ed] unilaterally to ‘comprehensively transform’ Medicaid” using “a narrow statutory waiver authority” that has “effectively rewritten the statute.” More plainly, the requirements risk the loss of Medicaid by creating new eligibility requirements that may be beyond HHS’s authority. The plaintiffs also raised the concern that the process violated the Administrative Procedures Act stating that the proper notice and public comment period was not met.

It is also possible for the court to consider if the waiver qualifies as “experimental,” if authority was exceeded when HHS determined that these policies further the objectives of the program, if policies are supported by evidence in the administrative policy, and if the work requirements were issued without formal notice and comment rule-making.

MEDICAID ENROLLEES ARE ALREADY WORKING

Right here in Michigan we have data showing that Medicaid enrollees are working and that their ability to have health insurance improves their work outcomes. A study by the University of Michigan shows that of those enrolled in Michigan’s Medicaid expansion program, Healthy Michigan, 69% did better at work once they were covered, and that those who were out of work said that coverage made it easier for them to seek out a job. What is also notable is that those surveyed who were not working stated numerous justifiable reasons including poor health, chronic conditions, age or other limitations.

In another study of Healthy Michigan recipients done by the University of Michigan, 48.8% of respondents said they were employed. It is an important reminder that although they are employed and qualify for Medicaid, they make no more than about $15,800 for an individual or $32,300 for a family of four. Additionally, 27.6% of enrollees were out of work, with many stating poor health status, chronic illness or mental illness as their reason for not having work. The rest of those surveyed who were not working stated they were unable to work due to fair or poor health (11.3%), or because they were retired (2.5%), students (5.2%) or homemakers (4.5%).

Other studies related to Medicaid employment nationwide show that 6 out of 10 nonelderly Medicaid enrollees are working and 8 out of 10 Medicaid enrollees live in a household where someone is working. Similar to the study done in Michigan, those who are not working state that disability, caregiving responsibilities or going to school are the reasons they are not.

The evidence is clear that Medicaid enrollees are working, and those who are not face legitimate health issues or other barriers associated with their age or position in life. On the face, it is possible that those who have asserted why they do not or cannot work could be viewed as “exempt” from work requirements, but obtaining that exemption can often be difficult and could result in losing health coverage or never being able to obtain it. States’ decisions to propose work requirements are a solution in search of a problem, as it is evident that people on Medicaid are working—often more than one job—to help support their families.

EXEMPTIONS WILL BE HARD TO GET

The ability to be granted a so-called exemption from work requirements may be difficult for some people to get. While it is likely that states will propose exemptions for the people who are “medically frail,” the narrow language of this definition could result in individuals losing their coverage. Typically, people who receive Supplemental

Security Income (SSI) would qualify for exemption through the “medically frail” distinction, but it is not clear at this time how non-SSI adult Medicaid enrollees who may also suffer from a disability or chronic health condition and are not able to work will obtain an exemption. Right here in Michigan, we can look at the 27.6% of Healthy Michigan recipients surveyed that reported serious chronic conditions as a reason for not working.

The process of obtaining medical records, physician statements or other documents to prove exemption can be a difficult task, made more difficult for individuals not currently enrolled in a health insurance program. States are required to comply with the Americans with Disabilities Act and other laws that protect people with disabilities—CMS has provided little insight into how they are to prove their exemption.

BUREAUCRACY AND LOST COVERAGE

The long history of difficult enrollment practices in programs such as the Children’s Health Insurance Program (CHIP) and Medicaid foreshadow further concerns about imposing work requirements. The inability for individuals to manage complex paperwork and government bureaucracy could result in individuals losing coverage. One cause of major concern could be those who may be seeking an exemption from work requirements but may have difficulties completing the appropriate paperwork due to a chronic disease or disability and therefore would have to comply with the requirements. Depending on how the waiver was written, noncompliance with the work requirement could result in additional negative actions; for example, Kentucky’s waiver includes a six-month lockout from coverage for not complying with the work requirements.

In another layer of bureaucracy, paperwork that will be needed to prove meeting work requirements does not only need to be completed by the individual required to meet them. Employers will also need to fill out paperwork proving that an individual is in fact working, and doctors will have to sign-off should a person not be able to work. People will fall through the cracks, sometimes by no fault of their own, due to burdensome paperwork.

There is also concern regarding the impact implementing a work requirement would have on employees in state government. Tracking individuals who must meet work requirements will mean additional training and paperwork for state employees. The process of enrolling in and renewing Medicaid is already difficult and additional requirements are sure to put a strain on state agencies and employees. Michigan doesn't need more red tape and it would be irresponsible to think that adding work requirements will do anything except cost the state significant amounts of money and add more paperwork for everyone.

STATE BUDGET IMPACTS

The guidance that has come from CMS requires states to identify how they will assist enrollees in attaining, seeking and maintaining work. However, it does not allow the use of federal Medicaid funds to provide this assistance. Given the current status of Michigan's budget, lower projected revenues and changes in the tax code, it is hard to identify where the state would be able to come up with funding to support these types of programs. There are multiple barriers that may interfere with an individual's ability to comply with work requirements including job training, transportation and child care that the state would have to address. In order to comply with guidance from CMS, the state—should it decide to impose work requirements—would potentially need to pull from other state services in order to provide the required support for enrollees. This could result in cuts to education, infrastructure or other vital social service programs that Michigan lawmakers and residents tend to prioritize.

A recent report out of Kentucky shows that the estimated cost of simply setting up the infrastructure to track work requirements will cost nearly $187 million just in the first six months, of which $167 million is expected to come from the federal government. In Tennessee, the estimated work requirements would cost the state $18.7 million a year with the federal government kicking in an additional $15 million. Similar studies in states such as Virginia also show the need for significant financial investment to set up electronic systems, hire additional staff and track individuals, including providing individuals the needed resources to find work. To date, CMS has not commented on the increased federal spending on administration. States would need to invest significant funding to provide individuals the needed support to access jobs, including job training and professional development opportunities.

Kentucky officials have said that they expect the implementation of work requirements and other reforms will save the state over $2 billion dollars. This savings is likely to come as a result of people losing their coverage by not being able to meet these harsh requirements or not even being able to attain coverage due to reforms.

STATUS OF REQUESTS IN OTHER STATES

Numerous states have submitted requests to HHS and CMS to allow work requirements for Medicaid enrollees. Almost immediately following the announcement that waiver requests for work requirements would be accepted, a request submitted by Kentucky was approved. The Kentucky waiver includes a number of problematic reforms including lockouts, ending retroactive coverage and imposing premiums in addition to work requirements.

The work requirement accepted in Kentucky requires that enrollees who are not primary caretakers, pregnant or full-time students must work, volunteer, be searching for a job or seeking job training for at least 80 hours a month, unless they are already working 30 hours a week. Documentation is required monthly and if the requirement is not maintained, enrollees' Medicaid will be suspended unless other arrangements are made, including making up hours or enrolling in health or financial literacy classes. These so-called reforms are expected to significantly reduce the number of individuals who are able to attain and maintain Medicaid coverage. Kentucky expects that as a result of the harsh reforms allowed in their waiver request, Medicaid enrollment will drop by 3% in the first year, ultimately growing to 15% in the fifth year. This means 20,000 enrollees with low incomes will lose this valuable health coverage in the first year and grow to over 100,000 by the fifth year—this includes those enrolled in the state's Medicaid expansion program.

Like in Michigan, many of those enrolled in Medicaid in Kentucky are working or find that maintaining Medicaid coverage improves their ability to seek and maintain work. The harsh requirements of reporting will result in individuals losing access to coverage, including for chronic conditions or substance use disorders, and additional barriers to keeping and maintaining employment.

IS MICHIGAN NEXT?

Legislation has been introduced in the Michigan House of Representatives to impose work requirements on the Healthy Michigan population, with additional rumors swirling about other attempts to implement work requirements. As lawsuits move forward in Kentucky, it is imperative that Michigan look at the human and financial costs of attempting to implement work requirements, especially with the growing data and information that shows they are likely to cause more harm than good.

Instead of burdening individuals with harsh and confusing work requirements, it would be more productive for Michigan lawmakers to invest in job training and continued support for the Medicaid program, without which many Michiganders would lose access to valuable health coverage that allows them to work and provide for their families.
